The President's Sincerity

The action of President McKinley in ordering an investigation of "the conduct of the commissary, the quartermaster and medical bureaus of the war department, and the extent, causes and treatment of the sickness in the field and in the camps," should effectually put a stop to the mean abuses of the Executive on the part of the yellow press and conscienceless Democratic organs, that are attempting to prejudice the country against the administration for partisan

There have been some malicious statements made concerning the President, even since it was known that he would order just such an investigation. We had an example of it in Wheeling Saturday, furnished by the organ here, which has not hesitated to print anything and everything that tended to reflect on the administration, in obedience to the policy adopted to make partisan capital of something in which politics are not involved, for the want of an honorable issue. Editorially the organ declared that the President would not order an investigation; that Secretary Alger's request was a "bluff," and that the President himself was afraid of an investigation. This was but one of the numerous falsehoods which have been published, being conceived in mailce, and printed for a despicable purpose. The commission is not composed of interested parties. If all those requested to serve by the President consent, the personnel of the board of inquiry will consist of men who are so favorably known to the country as to prohibit a single adverse criticism, either as to the appointees or their findings. The President's message addressed to each of them states that it is his earnest wish that "this committee shall be of such high character as will command the complete confidence of the country." The men whom he has invited to serve are precisely of this character. Five of them are from civil life; the others ar military men of great experience in the civil war on both sides, including Lieutenant Schofield (retired) and General Gordon, whose experience on the Confederate side in handling troops was about the same as that of General Schofield, on the northern side, both having been corps commanders, The country can depend upon two things: An entirely impartial investigation and the absolute sincerity of President McKinley, partisan assaults to the contrary notwithstanding.

Deserved Rebukes. Many of the leading Democratic papers in the country are rebuking strongly some of their Democratic contemporaries that are disgracefully secking to make political capital of the sufferings of our troops who have been sick in the camps-a state of affairs which is well understood by experienced soldiers, and was brought about by causes which were inevitable, and, under the circumstances, unavoidable in some cases, and in others by the failure to observe proper sanitary rules. The latter cause was a lack of discipline mainly due to the lack of experience on the part of some regimental officers, and the ignorance of sanitary rules of men who were taken from private life into a new sort of life which they had never before faced. Some of these Democratic journals rebuking the partisan demagogues who are indulging in this despicable business are not minding matters, as, for instance, the Cincinnati Enquirer, in the following paragraph, which is going the rounds "The storm center of the whole ques-tion is whether the war should have been commenced in June or October. It is worth the pains to note the fact that those who are most violent in trying to find scapegoats for the present preva-lence of sickness and death are those who most violently demanded an im-mediate flight to arms. They are the warriors who thought Havana could be taken in two weeks, and who thought that prolongation of the war to thirty taken in two weeks, and who thought that prolongation of the war to thirty days would be sufficient grounds for court-martialing the commander-in-chief."

This is an exact statement which will recall to the minds of many the abuse to which the administration was subjected for alleged delay in sending troops to Cuba even before there were any preparations whatever. More than that, it recalls the assaults which were made upon the administration for not proceeding direct to Havana, when every military officer knew from the beginning that it would be the most injudicious course that could be adopted, if it did not, indeed, prove absolutely suicidal.

The rapid and successful prosecution of the war to a finish within four months was a disappointment to these shouters, who had hoped their charges that delay would prolong the war for a year would prove true. Having been disappointed all around, they are now attempting to make political capital of the sickness and suffering of troops as an off-set. Had their demands been heeded at the start by the President, things would have been in a hundred times worse condition than they now are. They shouted "On to Havana" before the volunteers were even equipped and at a time when ammunition and supplies were deficient,

These partisans should be thankful that the President was too wise and cool-headed to listen to their advice, The rebukes they are now receiving for their contemptible partisan course as deserved as the public condemnation of them was for their assaults upon the administration at the beginning.

Murder of Empress Elizabeth.

The assassination of the Empress Elizabeth, of Austria, by an Italian anarchist, at Geneva, Switzerland, was a dastardly deed, for which there could have been no motive whatever, not even the excuse that anarchists are so apt to give for their crimes-that the victim was an oppressive ruler. The empress was not a ruler, but, on the contrary, was as different from all the remainder of European royalty as it was possible to be. In her manners and mode of life she was democratic to the point of eccentricity, and her freedom of action in circulating among the people incognito, and without protection, going alone about the streets of cities she visited, was commented on by all of Europe. It was this eccentricity which led to her

The anarchist had gone to Switzerland to murder a man of note, he does not say whom, but not finding that victim, chose the empress of Austria, who was on one of her shopping tours, practically unattended and walking on the streets of Geneva. Some one with a title, no matter what the rank, nor from what country, had to be the vic-tim of a diabolical deed by that irresponsible and fanatical anarchist. In this case the crime was all the more cowardly because the victim was a woman.

Anarchists will rejoice because the murdered woman was the wife of the emperor of Austria, Francis Joseph. That suits the bloodthirstiness of the anarchists, who in their insane enthusiasm, never for a moment stop to consider that the death of this latest victim of the stilleto carries with it no political significance.

Mr. Pointdexter Against Salt.

In view of the popular belief that the use of salt is an essential to humanity which leads a great many people to apply it very liberally to their food as a seasoning, an article by J. D. Pointdexter, of the medical department of the United States army, is of considerable interest, and to most readers is a revelation. He takes strong grounds against the use of salt, and will doubtless find in the medical profession and foed experts in general many who will oppose his radical opinions on the subject. Briefly, Mr. Pointdexter holds the view that sait is not the best thing in the world to take into one's stomach, that it promotes headache and is injurious in other respects. He declares it to be unwholesome in its action, being an irritant which, by reason of the fact that it undergoes no chemical change, is carried throughout the system. This is an assertion which Mr. Pointdexter says he has demonstrated, and he also claims that he has personally proven by his own quitting the use of salt as a mere condiment or relish for food, his health has been improved. He admits that it was hard to become used to diet without salt, but he finally became accustomed to it and appreciated what he are for its

If Mr. Pointdexter proposes to "reform" salt out of use by this reasoning he may find that he has undertaken a stupendous campaign. He must overcome the popular beliefs of centuries and the natural appetite of millions. His theory that the liking of sait is morbid, like that for morphine and other drugs, is probably carrying his idea too far. Mr. Pointdexter, however, is not the only man who has raised an objection to sait. Others have preached his doctrine, to find scientists and physicians agreeing with them only to the extent of admitting that a less amount of salt consumed by the average person would be advisable and beneficial. As in the case of other condiments, the excessive use is undoubtedly harmful,

Those who use salt meats exclusively are often afflicted with complaints such as Mr. Pointdexter describes, Sailors, who take long cruises and are often compelled to rely on salt meats, are class who are afflicted a great deal with scurvey. If the public can be persuaded to a more moderate use of salt as a condiment, in all probability the evils which Mr. Pointdexter points out may be reduced. With the millions of humanity at present the substance is regarded as a necessary aid to digestion, as well as a relish, and, while this idea may be extreme, it has nevertheless prevailed since the earliest days of which we have record. Among the ancients sait was regarded as a sacred article, and was worshipped as a gift from the gods. Those who will take the trouble to read up on the subject will find some interesting facts showing the great value placed upon it and its virtues, while the frequent references in this respect that are made to salt in the Scriptures are familiar to all Bible readers. Mr. Pointdexter's theory is, to a certain degree, undoubtedly reasonable and log-ical, but in some respects he takes rather an advanced ground. Discussion of the question among scientists is not a new thing, but in connection with the subject of rations in our military camps it is a live topic at present,

The Pittaburgh Post celebrated its fifty-sixth birthday on Saturday, and the Intelligencer joins with its contemporaries in congratulations on its long life. Though the Post has been all these years advocating Democratic principles, through their many changes, it has managed to maintain itself in a strong Republican city and is the recognized organ of the party there. Without admiring the Post's mistaken politics Intelligencer takes pleasure in adding its testimony to its excellence as a news

HELPING THE ENEMY.

What the Distoyal Papers of the Country are Doing for Spain. Washington Star (Ind.): There will probably be no abatement of the uproar going on in this country about the management of the war, but we ought not to close our eyes to the fact that echoe of it are traveling far and wide, and wherever they go in a distorted and partisan form, are highly injurious to the American name and interests.

Let us consider the matter in its relation to the situation in Spain. We are dealing with the Spanish government on the subject of permanent peace. The cortes is in session, and Senor Sagasta is asking for authority to grant the terms we have imposed. His position is that Spain was clearly overmatched in the struggle with the United Siates, and could do no less than abandon the field after the fact became manifest. As he claims, he yielded to the inevitable and made the best terms possible. His opponents, however, insist that the Spanish cause was all but openly betrayed; that at Santiago, in particular, General Toral suffered himself either to be builled or bambooaled, and that the American triumph was purely the result of a Spanish fluke.

Now, which side of the question are we supporting? Strangely and discreditably enough, the side of Senor Sagasta's Spanish opponents. We are holding with them that the American triumph at Santiago was not won by valor or soldierly management, but was the result of Spanish stupidity and irresolution. General Shafter is berated as an incompetent. There was neither head nor tail to-his expedition. His courage forsook him in the critical hour. His forces likewise were demoralized. Panic hovered over the American camp. Had General Toral possessed a high order of courage and enterprise he might by a furious onslaught have annihilated his enemy. But, with all the cards necessary to win, he weakened and laid down his hand.

Admiral Cervera is also the subject of severe Spanish censure. His enemies assert that his opportunity was excelent, but his maneuvering was excerable. And we are aiding that. We are holding up our chief of naval command as a chump and pretender, whose appointment was due to a flagrant exercise of favoritism. Admiral Gervera, his enemies allege, invited destruction by first rushing into the wrong harbor and then rushing out at the wrong time. Had he possessed the proper fighting independ the mish whom some Americans themselves thoroushiy disparage.

Are we not, indeed, sowing Senor Sagasta's pathway
